Introduction by the Chair of the Board of Trustees

For many of people involved in the management of the Foundation, 2002 was a year of new responsibilities. Peter Laugharn moved up from his position of Director of Programme Development and Management to become Executive Director; Liana Gertsch moved up to take his place; Patricia Light-Borsellini joined us as Director of Programme Documentation and Communication; and I myself moved up to take on the role of Chair of the Board of Trustees.

However, such changes were also balanced by continuity: each of us is building on the excellent work of our predecessors and of the Foundation’s staff, at the same time as we make our own distinctive marks on the development of the Foundation. We all depend on the Foundation’s rich past and its achievements in the field of early childhood development (ecd). Nonetheless, we have to check that we are up to the demanding standards set by the Foundation’s mission and the legacy of the Van Leer family, as we play our roles in interpreting these in response to the demands of changing times.

Some of the challenges that we face are constants. I think of the tension between our concerns and ambitions on the one hand, and the influence that we can have on the other. For example, we want to make a real difference to the lives of as many young children as we can and yet we have comparatively limited means. To resolve this, the Foundation has always worked with local partners who operate projects that support children’s principal caregivers as they strive to give young children the best possible start in life. We believe that this approach reinforces the roles of parents and families as children’s first educators, ensures that what is done is contextually appropriate, and ensures sustainability and the efficient use of our resources as well.

To enhance this efficiency, we also want our partners to exchange experiences and good practice among themselves and with the wider ecd community. And step by step we are exploring new tools to enable them to do so, most obviously by adding new technological means to more traditional media.

Learning processes like these also reach into the Foundation itself. For example, we are taking advantage of the diversity of our experiences in funding ecd projects over many years, by learning from them and sharing the results. In this, we reflect the demands of our Strategic Plan 2002-2006 that requires us to continue the process of becoming a learning organisation, something that is being led by Peter Laugharn. The objective is to further professionalise the organisation by building on the expertise that helps us to choose the right local partners to support, and to judge with them the right approach for a particular society and situation. It is also our ambition to continue to be innovative in the field of early childhood development, to find more effective ways of responding to local realities and enhancing local resources and potential.

Such approaches, the competencies that help them to work, the accumulation of knowledge that informs them, and the love of children that underpins them, are key. But they are not enough. We also have to ensure that early childhood development achieves much greater priority worldwide, given the many quantifiable and unquantifiable benefits that accrue for young children, their families, communities and societies. The Foundation is therefore committing itself to taking an important and catalytic role in helping to put early childhood development emphatically on the world’s agenda, and in keeping it there.

This has never been more important: we are facing times in which the global economic situation is unstable and this will certainly have a negative impact on many already disadvantaged young children – and it could well influence our own budgets too.

In this situation, focus and determination are the key words for the Foundation.

I am confident that the competent staff and Board members of the Foundation will confront these challenges with vigour and decisiveness.

Working for young children in 2002:
the report of the Executive Director

This report, my first as the Executive Director of the Bernard van Leer Foundation, briefly reviews the Foundation's operational year, and then goes on to discuss something of key interest to us in the wake of the United Nations Special Session on Children in May 2002: whether young children are really on the international agenda.

The Foundation's mandate is to improve the chances of young children living in disadvantaged situations. We do this in two ways. The first is by supporting early childhood development (ecd) projects that are conceptualised and brought to operational status through close partnerships with local partners who then go on to operate the projects. This is the work of our Department of Programme Development and Management. Our second way of supporting children, involves gathering experiences and information, analysing these, learning from them, and sharing our learning with others; and is the work of our Department of Programme Documentation and Communication.

The year 2002 was an important one for us in that it was the time of the launch of our new Strategic Plan, which concentrates on the Bernard van Leer Foundation as a learning organisation, building and sharing knowledge in key areas of early childhood development. Both of our programmatic departments are closely involved in this effort.

The Department of Programme Development and Management, under its newly-promoted Director Liana Gertsch, made 152 grants in 2002 for a total value of EUR 14.8 million. These included grants both for new projects and for extensions for existing projects to allow them to tackle new areas of work. Details of over 130 major grants made in 2002 can be found on pages 34-51. Overall, more than 240 projects were supported by the Foundation during the year. While each of these is closely tailored to its context, much of our programme of project support is clustered around a number of themes that may stretch across and beyond regions. This reflects a strategic choice within the Strategic Plan: that we find ways to maximise our impact – something that is exemplified by the Caribbean-wide programme of family support that is discussed in detail on pages 10-14.

Within the Strategic Plan, the Department of Programme Documentation and Communication will sustain its extensive documentation and publication programme – details of which can be found on our website: www.bernardvanleer.org – and go further and become more proactive in documenting and communicating. An example of this is its programme of Tracer Studies. These look at the impact of early childhood programmes by following up children and/or adults who participated in early childhood programmes some years earlier. Each study is designed and implemented locally, either by the project partner or with its full cooperation, and the methodology is more qualitative than quantitative. A review of our Tracer Studies programme can be found in the feature ‘Following footsteps: discovering how early childhood programmes impact on participants’ on pages 16-17. Also in line with pro-activity in documentation and communication, in 2002 the Programme Documentation and Communication department increased its level of support to project partners for these activities.

Here, I would like to pay tribute to the Director of the Department of Programme Documentation and Communication during most of 2002, Judith L. Evans: a creative and stimulating leader who sustained the evolution of the department for three years, enriching it with her ideas, and with the width and depth of her knowledge. Judith has moved on to follow interests that include developing the Foundation-supported ecd Virtual University; and will also be working on a major book for the Foundation about the Effectiveness Initiative (see below). I am delighted to welcome Patricia Light-Borsellini as her replacement. Patricia comes to us from UNICEF and the ngo sector, with a wealth of field-based experience, a thorough understanding of childhood-related issues and a long history in communications and children’s rights.

Our learning agenda
Despite several decades of experience, we acknowledge that we need to learn by seeking new knowledge and insights, analysing and synthesising our experience and that of others, and by ploughing this information back into new programming. We must also share our learning. During the year, we began establishing initiatives: extended programmes of work that reach across and beyond the Foundation, each of which investigate an important aspect of early childhood. The first, our ‘Growing up in Indigenous Societies Initiative’, was launched in November 2002. It will explore four key topics identified in a consultation with indigenous people that the Foundation organised in April 2002. More details about this can be found on pages 20-23. A second initiative, on ‘Young Children and nursery’, was in development at the end of the year, again growing from an international consultation process. This is discussed in the feature on pages 24-27. A third initiative, on ‘Respect for Diversity’, is likely to be formulated in 2003. In addition, other aspects of the Foundation’s thematic work will be viewed through the lens of a number of cross-cutting issues, such as ‘Children’s Voices’ and ‘Fatherhood’, but in less strictly structured and prominent ways.

All of these themes, whether structured into formal initiatives or otherwise, are being pursued by informal groupings of Foundation staff. These groups help the Foundation to formulate key questions and learning objectives within the themes; to gather relevant information, knowledge and experience (both from Foundation grantee partners and from outside expertise); and to reflect on, debate, and synthesise knowledge for use in our dissemination activities.

Also in the context of learning, the Foundation’s Effectiveness Initiative (ei) proved fruitful during the year. This is a five-year, in-depth, qualitative look at what makes ecd programmes work for the people who take part in them, and for the communities that are intended to be enriched by them. It started in 1999 and involves 10 diverse projects operating in a range of distinct settings. During 2002, all 10 projects reached the end of their information gathering phase and were analysing their findings, both locally and across the ten research sites. Two workshops during the year, one in India, the other in Spain, brought together some of the findings and analyses; and all the materials generated from these workshops, together with those from site work, conferences and... workgroups, are now being brought together for analysis. One major outcome of this work will be an analytical and reflective book on the findings that will be completed in 2004. More information about the R1 can be found on our website.

Are young children on the international agenda?

An important question that we at the Bernard van Leer Foundation are currently discussing concerns the degree to which the young child, and specifically early childhood development, is really on the international agenda; and what organisations like the Foundation ought to be doing to enhance awareness of, and responses to, young children's issues.

The Foundation has been involved exclusively in the field of early childhood for more than thirty five years. At the beginning of that period, there was a fair degree of acknowledgement of the importance of early childhood within certain industrialised countries, but it was not a priority issue in most of the developing world.

During the eighties and early nineties, the Foundation and others made a concerted effort to put the issue of early childhood on the international agenda, with particular emphasis on the benefits of early childhood approaches to children, families, and society in developing countries. These awareness-raising efforts were quite successful, as can be seen in a number of developments from that time. First, as a result of the successful campaign by the early childhood coalition to get young children onto the worldwide agenda, the Jomtien Declaration, produced by the 1990 World Conference on Education for All, was very clear, stating that:

> Learning begins at birth. This calls for early childhood care and initial education. These can be provided through arrangements involving families, communities or institutional programmes, as appropriate.

Going further, the Framework for Action that emerged from the Conference set targets to be considered by signatories in their plans for the 1990s:

- Expansion of early childhood care and development activities, including family and community interventions, especially for poor, disadvantaged and disabled children.

Secondly, the World Summit for Children of young children and help them realise their individual and social potential.

All of these developments made the early 1990s an exciting time and led to some important changes in the landscape of early childhood development. Two significant factors have contributed greatly to these changes. The first is the considerable increase in donor interest in early childhood internationally, nor by any means the biggest. New funders have come onto the scene, most evidently the World Bank. Its investment of approximately US$1.4 billion on early childhood development since 1990, makes it by far the largest funder of early childhood in the developing world. In addition, UNICEF has made integrated early childhood one of its five priority goals, and given the issue high visibility.

The second factor is more recent. The Dakar Framework on Education for All of 2000 essentially carried forward the formulation of Jomtien, making ecd the first of its six goals:

> Expanding and improving comprehensive early childhood care and education, especially for the most vulnerable and disadvantaged children.

UNESCO has been charged with monitoring the achievement of this goal.

Thus there has been much progress. But we should also look critically at where early childhood stands as an issue today, identify the gaps, and pledge ourselves to redouble our efforts. The three areas of focus are Education for All, the Millennium Development Goals, and children’s rights.

Progress on early childhood within the Education for All (EFA) framework is incomplete. While it is true that there is an ecd goal, not much attention has been paid to its achievement, compared to that given to the more visible goals around increasing access, quality, and gender equity in primary schooling. As a person who earlier worked for nearly a decade to promote the expansion of primary schooling in Africa, I should state that I am strongly in favour of the achievement of the primary schooling goals. I am, however, also stating that it is important that in the coming years we – and here I mean both the ecd and the EFA communities – take a look together at the governance of the first goal of the MDGs in order to ensure that there is sufficient momentum to achieve the goal. After all, early childhood is the foundation of subsequent education goals, whether they address access to schooling, learning outcomes, dropout, or gender equity. One key question that needs to be answered is why exactly is early childhood so little prioritised beyond survival and basic health needs?

This question also arises when considering the eight Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) that were adopted at the Millennium Summit of the United Nations in September 2000. These provide a framework for successful collective action on poverty reduction by the year 2015:

- to eradicate extreme poverty and hunger;
- to achieve universal primary education;
- to promote gender equality and empower women;
- to reduce child mortality;
- to improve maternal health;
- to combat HIV/AIDS, malaria, and other diseases;
- to ensure environmental sustainability; and
- to develop a global partnership for development.

The links with the field of early childhood are obvious: some of these goals directly target young children, for example those on hunger, child mortality, and the universalisation of primary education; while it is also clear that approaches and strategies typically found in early childhood development projects are key to the realisation of these goals.

But a closer look at the objectives underlying the MDGs reveals that, as far as young children are concerned, there is a strong preoccupation with two age groups: children under two, for whom survival is the greatest concern; and those aged six and over, who are of primary school age. The MDGs generally do not address the three to five-year age group, although it is widely recognised that this is a crucial age for cognitive, social, and emotional development. Nor do the MDGs address development beyond survival for children under three. Two reasons may be suggested for this: first, that the MDGs rely heavily on quantifiable indicators, and the non-physical aspects of early childhood development are difficult to quantify. The second reason might be that many of those engaged in development see this period as one of relatively lower risk: seemingly there is nothing as significant in this period as the survival of very young children or the successful schooling of older children. However, those of us in early childhood know that this formative period of early childhood is indeed a time of both risk and opportunity, and that the benefits of investing in child development in this period can be meaningfully measured. The stakeholders in early childhood have to make this case strongly. It is a real challenge, but one that we should collectively address in the decade leading up to the target date for achieving the MDGs: 2015.

Finally, a word about children’s rights. The Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) gave us new tools with which to address disadvantage and inequity, and the UN Special Session on Children in 2002 highlighted the importance of this work. But much remains to be done to interpret and apply these rights regarding younger children. For example, Article 28 on the right to education clearly equates education with schooling, and does not have a specific provision for the years before entry into primary school. Other rights apply fully to young children, but work needs to be done on how they should be understood and implemented. For its part, Article 12 guarantees the right of children to express their views on matters that affect them. However, the phrase ‘the views of the child being given due weight in accordance with the age and maturity of the child’ calls for interpretation, as adolescents and four-year-olds express themselves in very different ways. The Foundation is pursuing these issues with a range of partners, and our initial thinking can be found in Early Childhood Matters editions 94 (February 2008: Listening to children) and 98 (June 2001: The CRC and young children).

Oddly, a recent review for the Foundation, of Alternative NGO Reports on the CRC, shows that Article 6 – which covers children’s inherent right to life, to survival and (crucially) development – appears to have received little attention as a stimulus for action. Yet this is a key article for young children because development is of fundamental importance in the early years. The job now is to highlight the fact that development is enshrined in the CRC as a right, and promote our understanding of development in the early years as being necessarily holistic, by demonstrating the quantifiable and non-quantifiable benefits that can be expected to accrue to children, their families, their communities and their wider societies.

In conclusion, I would say that, in terms of the extent to which young children are on the international agenda, the balance sheet is mixed. They certainly have a place but it is neither prominent enough nor sufficiently acknowledged. The need now is to reaffirm Jomtien and Dakar by reasserting the importance of early childhood development, with the aim of making that place one that is developing dynamically and that is well-funded. The Bernard van Leer Foundation seeks to play an important and catalytic role in this during the coming years, through both our grant-making and our knowledge sharing work. I look forward to more reflection and output on these topics, and to the Foundation’s engagement in the debates around them.

Peter Laugharn
Background

During our 35 years of experience in the Caribbean, we have gradually addressed the need to increasingly embed our diverse set of projects in Jamaica, the Netherlands Antilles, and Trinidad and Tobago in a broader, more integrated programmatic framework. In 1996 a regional thrust was launched to foster linkages between ecd agencies and to facilitate opportunities for training and learning in the areas of parenting education, childcare and teenage pregnancy prevention. This was done with the intention of putting the needs of very young children and their parents at the centre of Caribbean consciousness.

More recently, in 2000, the Foundation provided technical and financial support to the organisation of the Third Caribbean Conference on Early Childhood Education, held in Jamaica. A significant product of the Conference was the approval of the Caribbean Plan of Action for ecd by the Heads of Government of the Caribbean Community (caricom) states. The plan provides a combination of strategies to tackle the needs of children that are in tune with national priorities, cultural realities and parental expectations.

In 2001 the Foundation’s own Strategic Plan 2002-2006 revealed a strong internal interest in more synergistic approaches to grant making and programme development. Collaboration was established with the Caribbean Centre for Development Administration (caricad), to prepare a multi-year endeavour in the region, which resulted in the CSI.

Problem identification

The Caribbean region is in the grip of an economic crisis caused by the disruption of the banana industry, and the decline of the business and tourist sector. Steady outward migration patterns and escalating trends towards organised crime, violence and drug abuse further contribute to a deterioration of the quality of life. Between 12 and 60 percent of the population in the region continues to live below the poverty line. Children experience first hand the social effects of this crisis.

In socialising children, Caribbean parents stress the importance of good manners and obedient behaviour, they teach conformity and ‘listening’ to their caregivers, and foremost, they appreciate the child’s academic success. Children are perceived as passive receivers of the parents’ authority, in whose presence they are expected to remain silent. There is hardly any appreciation of play and confidence-building at an early age, let alone opportunities for children to be creative and use their imagination.

At the community level, we find the same barriers obstructing healthy relationships between adults and children. The interactions between caregivers/teachers and children often mirror the authoritative parent-child relationship, which leaves no room for the development of self-confidence and assertiveness. Youth are especially subject to prejudice and negative stereotyping; they are painted as loud, unsociable, disruptive, and even prone to aggression and violence. There is very little tolerance of adolescents who get pregnant. Schools do not hesitate to send them away, completely ignoring the damage to their emotional and psychological development.

But many older parents also suffer from a low sense of self worth, especially the women who often carry the double burden of work and childcare. There are very few opportunities to acquire relevant parenting knowledge and skills in a supportive environment. The media put even more pressure on them, as witnessed by the undesirable role models and the negative impact on young children of sex and violence shown in their programmes.

Programme principles

While the Bernard van Leer Foundation lacks the means and resources to contribute to a solution of the many structural problems at a macro level that are presently felt in the Caribbean region, we can and do focus our efforts at the level of the family and strive towards a supportive role in addressing the major issues that are relevant in relation to childrearing and that affect the parent/caretaker-child relationship within the community.
Our work in the Caribbean in relation to our support of programmes for children and families reflects:

- an integrated approach to ecd programming, and the establishment of linkages between the separate programme objectives and strategies;
- a participatory approach, that seeks the involvement of partners in the decision making process, and uses local understanding, knowledge and ownership of concepts and strategies;
- a clear-cut task-oriented approach that the complexity and diversity of the region calls for;
- the use of tested, locally developed support models that further the introduction of relevant practice at national and community level; and
- the need for continued experimentation with new methodologies, based on newly emerging needs and insights.

The target groups of the programme are members of those high-risk families that are very often excluded from the formal support apparatus. These include very young mothers and their infants, as well as adolescents – early dropouts and school leavers. HIV/AIDS is also an important factor: on some islands it is already accounting for 40 percent of deaths among youth; the number of paediatric cases is on the rise; and across the Caribbeans, it is threatening the economic gains of the last two to three decades in the region.

The csi is implemented under the aegis of CARICAD through a small intermediary project office which operates from Barbados.

A Regional Steering Group is comprised of influential practitioners, academics and policy makers; individuals who participate in their capacity as resource persons with specialised knowledge and skills. The group advises on issues relating to the implementation of the different strategies, gives feedback on work plans developed as part of the csi, supports staff in developing new activities, and facilitates access to key agencies/institutions active at different levels.

Programme objectives and strategies

Specifically, the csi’s objectives are to:

1) introduce and support the implementation of good parenting practice in ecd at the community level, taking advantage of validated child development programmes that include parent education.

2) Share relevant knowledge and skills on culturally appropriate child development and parenting practices. This information is made widely available for prime caretakers, adolescents and professional service providers. Media is one vehicle used for sharing the information.

3) Build capacity in parenting support within ecd programmes. It is only through the creation of local capacity that family support services can be established and sustained.

In order to accomplish these objectives, the csi programme uses four primary strategies.

Strategy 1: Replication and dissemination

This strategy addresses the fact that there is insufficient knowledge and spread of good ecd and parenting practice in the region. In 2002 a consultant was hired to explore the possibility of devising a replication process of those projects that were identified as representing ‘good practice’ in the region. As a result, a programme of replication of a project in Jamaica is being implemented in St. Lucia and Dominica. This is the Roving Caregivers project that trains and supervises young women (rovers) to work with young mothers and their toddlers on developmental activities. The programme is now multi-faceted: male caregivers are enrolled; parents have been mobilised for income-generating activities; and referrals are being made to agencies for immunisation, birth registration and developmental delays.

Strategy 2: Research and documentation

The csi recognises that there is insufficient documentation of ecd and parent support practices in the region. Therefore, the project will identify and develop specific pathways for action which will allow for ecd and parenting materials to be generated; for documentation expertise not readily available with community-based agencies to be mobilised; and for knowledge and skills of staff on matters of documentation and communication to be built. Two main project strands have been identified for elaboration under this strategy:

Strand 1: A parenting research project

There is no accurate knowledge of the scope of parent education in the region. In fact, there is a lack of uniformity or cohesion in the various approaches. Both policy makers and practitioners have only a piecemeal understanding of parent education and what is out there, let alone an informed opinion about what would work best in their own context. Thus, in 2002, the Regional Steering Group formulated the terms of reference for an ethnographic study on childrearing and socialisation in two countries: A study of childrearing approaches for children 0-5 years in the Caribbean: the cases of Dominica and Trinidad and Tobago. Phase one of this endeavour (scheduled for the summer of 2003) will entail research into childrearing, while phase two will be a review of selected local parent support programmes and an evaluation of their impact.

Strand 2: A storytelling and writers project

There is a wealth of local traditions in storytelling waiting to be tapped and revived. While there is no specific Caribbean literature for children yet, there are potential writers and other creative people waiting for the opportunity to produce good quality materials. In 2002, five resource persons were identified from the region to serve on a storytelling working group. They created the terms of reference for a consultancy on storytelling in the Eastern Caribbean, which will be undertaken in 2003. The consultant will formulate the parameters and assist in planning a regional storytelling project.

Strategy 3: Learning and advocacy

There is insufficient exchange and networking at different levels, as well as a lack of initiatives both in the private and public spheres to provide information and disseminate ecd and parenting knowledge in the region. To address this issue, the csi is pursuing an experimentation strategy by identifying and providing support to small-scale experimental field projects which seek to test new approaches around young children and families. Support is provided from a Rapid Response Fund that allocates one-off grants to innovative projects. In 2002, three such grants were given.

The first was to the Christian Children’s Fund in Dominica for the production of a video entitled ‘Voices of Abused Children’. This will provide an opportunity to hear the stories of children from different Caribbean countries, and will be broadcast throughout the region.

The second grant went to the National Organisation for Prevention of Child Abuse (nopca) in Belize to pilot an intervention with incarcerated young unwed fathers, their children, and the children’s mothers. The idea is to institute a parenting programme with male prisoners, and reduce the adversarial condition prevalent in gender relations through the teaching of negotiation skills, anger management and conflict resolution. In 2003 the intervention will be documented in a manual and video.

The third grant went to paredos in Barbados for piloting on-site parenting work at local health clinics. A documentary will be produced to enable csi to disseminate the experiences in the region.

Strategy 4: Communication and media
This strategy involves the mass media – especially community and commercial radio – in public education and advocacy. In 2002, the csi undertook a preliminary study of how bodies of work with radio stations could be supported in order to help achieve the csi’s ecd goals. In collaboration with unesco, a community radio workshop was held at the Toco Radio station in Trinidad and Tobago. These efforts will eventually lead to a programme of support that brings together the outputs from the other csi strategies, such as the storytelling and writers activities.

Conclusions:
2002 was a year during which much groundwork for the establishment of the working strategies of the csi was accomplished. Local staff worked hard on various activities such as building up a network of contacts and resource persons, as well as informing and sensitising people and agencies at different levels on concepts and plans. The programme also set about devising and experimenting with new formats such as the formation of working groups, the establishment of a regranting mechanism, and the writing of the terms of reference for key consultancies, as well as conducting feasibility studies and workshops to prepare projects. But beyond the strategy activities listed above, the csi also began conceptualising relevant strategies around documentation and communication which will maximise the impact of the programme. Finally, preliminary discussions on the establishment of an evaluation mechanism were undertaken. Both of these last two activities will be further elaborated in 2003.
The overall aim of each study was to discover what impact a target early childhood development programme had had on its former participants. Tracer studies do this by following up children or adults who participated in early childhood programmes some years earlier. Each study is designed and implemented locally, either by the project partner or with its full cooperation. The samples are relatively small and the methodology is qualitative more than quantitative. Each is a relatively short exercise which can be inexpensive compared to many other kinds of research. It is also easy to understand and easy to explain to all the participants. Clearly, tracer studies are different in kind from those research approaches that aim to test a set of hypotheses. However, a combination of approaches will often produce complementary results that can usefully be considered together.

The former programme participants who cooperated in these tracer studies provided often personal and subjective information about specific aspects of the programme’s medium/long term impact on themselves. Reflections on this information can provide a richness that more formal analyses may not reveal.

One valuable tool here is the tracer study and the Foundation has been operating a programme of these since 1997. The studies were carried out in Botswana, Colombia, Honduras, Ireland, Israel, Jamaica, Kenya, Trinidad and the USA among a diverse set of projects in a range of distinct settings. Each study is unique in terms of its methodology, its focus and the communities with which it is engaged. However, the studies also have important characteristics in common – for example, all are implemented by locally-based partners; and their objectives all centre on developing and improving the lives of children and their families and communities in the here and now, based on the belief that this will lay the foundations for improved opportunities in the future.

Outcomes like these are rewarding for all concerned – and most of all, for the mothers and their children. But reaching former participants in programmes and hearing their stories is a complex task. Still more difficult is to somehow relate impact to the original objectives of the programme, its approaches and activities, and its environment and atmosphere: in short, why did it work?

She was three years when I put her into the centre. She was one of the first batch in the centre. Today, she is in the 7th Standard. She loves to study and goes to school without hesitation. My older daughter had not been to such a centre, so when I put her in school, she was not eager to study and dropped out. But Mona is very smart. She stands up boldly in her class and answers questions. Her teachers at the primary school are also praising her.

What next?

With the objective of learning from the past in order to inform and influence present and future work, the Foundation held a workshop in 2002 that brought together programme managers and researchers from all the tracer studies. The findings and lessons learned from their collective body of work are being compiled and published.

The nature of the information gathered through the tracer studies and during the workshop is very significant for the Foundation as we seek to understand the kinds of impact early childhood development projects are actually having on people. Tracer studies are valuable tools in helping us to assess our own effectiveness in funding projects and to thereby develop our thinking on programmatic issues. They are also valuable in helping us to understand the effectiveness of the projects themselves.

We are therefore reflecting on the various ways in which tracer studies can be used to increase understanding and knowledge on a range of issues. These include: indicators of progress and development; links between an early childhood programme and later behaviours and motivation of the participants; effects on the parents and caregivers and, later, on the participants’ own families and children; and the extent to which an early childhood programme eases children’s transition to the formal education system, as well as their subsequent achievements and progress.
Following footsteps: published tracer studies

Degazon-Johnson R (2001), A new door opened: a tracer study of the Teenage Mothers Project, Jamaica, Early Childhood Development: Practice and Reflections No. 13
The study traced the impact of the Teenage Mothers Project on a sample of 10 mothers and children who were participants between 1986 and 1989, and compared these with ten other mother and child pairs who had not been in the project. Significant differences were found between the two groups of mothers and the two groups of children.

Griffith J (2002), To handle life’s challenges: a tracer study of Servol’s Adolescent Development Programme in Trinidad, Early Childhood Development: Practice and Reflections No. 16
This study looks at the effects of the Adolescent Development Programme (ADP) on a sample of 40 young men and women some 10 years after their participation, and compares these with another group of 39 individuals with similar characteristics. The analysis was based on the criteria that are central to the ADP. The results showed that former trainees had benefited from the programme at a number of different levels. There were some similarities in findings between the ADP group and the Comparison Group and differences with respect to levels of self-esteem and childbearing.

This study looks at the effects of training for preschool teachers on the children they have cared for. Three cohorts of children who entered primary school in 1991, 1992 and 1993 were tracked through primary school to the classes they were in during 1999 – about half of these children had been cared for by trained preschool teachers, the others had been with untrained preschool teachers. Several benefits of trained preschool teachers were found, and children who had been cared for by them made the transition to primary school more successfully. Children’s overall performances were found to be considerably affected by several factors: the academic rating of the primary schools; high wastage in the form of absenteeism, repetition and dropout rates; and non-school related factors such as alcohol, drugs, child employment, and changing lifestyles.

Mollow B (2002), Still going strong: a tracer study of the Community Mothers Programme, Dublin, Ireland, Early Childhood Development: Practice and Reflections No. 17
This is a report of a seven-year follow-up study of mothers and children who participated in a home visiting programme during the first 12 months of the children’s lives. It follows an earlier study, when the children were one year old, that found significant beneficial effects for both mothers and children when compared to a control group. The report describes the origins, development and implementation of the programme, the motivation of and effects on the women who implement it, and three earlier pieces of research. Findings in the follow-up study were very positive for the mothers, for their children and for subsequent children.

Le Roux W (2002), The challenges of change: a tracer study of San preschool children in Botswana, Early Childhood Development: Practice and Reflections No. 15
The main body of this report is based on a study carried out during 1993-1995 that traced San children of primary school age who had participated in the Bokamoso Preschool Programme. It also includes an update to 2001 containing additional background information and new findings. This hunter-gatherer people no longer have access to their old territories or the skills to earn a livelihood. They face this situation with a sense of hopelessness and despair, unemployment is high and alcoholism is a serious problem. In the formal education system, the San children meet a different culture and have to cope with conflicting expectations and norms, as well as unfamiliar languages. Despite all this, the study found that the children who had attended preschools were mostly still in school, many parents were supportive of formal education, some head teachers were trying to adapt the school to the realities of the community, and many of the children believed to have dropped out were, in fact, still in school.

Levin-Rozalis M & Shafran N (2003), A sense of belonging: a tracer study of Almaya’s Parents’ Cooperative Kindergarten, Israel, Early Childhood Development: Practice and Reflections No. 19
The study looked at former participants in a Parents’ Cooperative Kindergarten programme that was operated by Almaya, an association that works with families who came to Israel from Ethiopia. The programme operated in two neighbourhoods of Beer-Sheva and the study has compared responses from former child participants (now in their early teens) with children of Ethiopian origin from the same neighbourhoods who were not in the programme, as well as with children of non-Ethiopian origin in a different town. It concludes that the children from the intervention group have acquired many of the tools that are necessary to better integrate into Israeli society.

Growing up in indigenous societies

The Bernard van Leer Foundation has been funding projects with Indigenous Peoples that support the development of young children for over thirty years; and our Strategic Plan 2002-2006 highlights the need to learn from this body of experience, from our partners, and from all other relevant sources. To articulate this learning, we have now developed a multi-year Initiative that promotes the education and rights of indigenous children, including the right to identity that is implicit in the ways in which Indigenous Peoples raise children in the first years, the use of indigenous languages in institutional settings such as preschool or school, birth registration and citizenship.

The Initiative will, over the next five years, sharpen the Foundation’s focus on indigenous young children – an area that is under represented in the international agenda – and allow us to explore in greater depth, from multiple perspectives, the reasons why these children derive only limited benefit from entitlements to education, civil rights, and cultural practices that nurture the young children. The information and knowledge that the Initiative will generate will be shared with our indigenous partners; with both the early childhood and the broader development communities; and with appropriate national and international agencies and organisations. Our aim is to promote programmes with young children that we can document as effective in terms of specific objectives, that are cost effective; and that are culturally appropriate.

Guiding principles

The Initiative takes into account the work of indigenous communities and organisations, UN bodies, international agencies and grant makers who have all acknowledged the need for special recognition and protection of Indigenous Peoples’ rights and ways of life. Specifically, it responds to realities such as that Indigenous Peoples are often threatened by discrimination, and by policies, decisions and programmatic choices that do not take into account their cultural traditions. And, for some indigenous communities, there are the extra hurdles of marginalisation and poverty.

The Initiative accepts that such challenges have to be countered, but also positively seeks to foster and promote many indigenous practices about, inter alia, childcare, including collective approaches to raising children. It will also share Indigenous Peoples’ understandings of childhood and highlight the choices that indigenous families make within the limited room for manoeuvring that they have.

To guide the operations of the Initiative – as is already the case with our programme of project support for indigenous early childhood development projects – we follow the Hundested Recommendations for Donor Best Practice.*

Themes, lessons, objectives and strategies

To ground the work of the Initiative, we identified a range of the most important themes and lessons that have emerged over the years from our collaboration with indigenous project partners; through a week-long consultation with indigenous practitioners; through participation in international forums; through discussions with peer organisations, and through monitoring of, and reflection on, the experiences of the projects that we have funded over the years. Four main themes emerged as foci: Rights and Responsibilities; Education of Indigenous Children; Raising Children 0-3 Years Old; and Indigenous Identity. These topics are inter-related and, depending on the context, may be addressed as issues that are intertwined. For example, education may explicitly teach about indigenous identity and self-esteem.

Simultaneously, the same processes produced a body of lessons, acquired knowledge and understandings. This comprised:

- that indigenous knowledge and practices that are conducive to early childhood development should be promoted in the context of ecd programmes;
- that continuous training and involvement of parents and other caregivers leads to sustainability and ownership;
- that relevant partnerships with other NGOs or government agencies are vital;
- that documentation of project activities is essential for ownership and replicability.

These outcomes informed and determined the specific objectives of the Initiative:

1. to enhance the quality of our programming with Indigenous Peoples in four different continents;
2. to increase our understanding of the key values of working with indigenous children;
3. to enhance Indigenous Peoples’ positive childrearing practices and promote these as a contribution to the general early childhood development field; and
4. to promote donor good practice and internationally agreed principles of working with Indigenous Peoples.
Reaching these objectives will be via two main strategies. The first is to map our own history in supporting indigenous programmes to provide a clear picture of what has been done, and with what results. This will include systematically documenting the evidence emerging from our field programmes that suggests effective ways to invest in indigenous children’s outcomes, particularly in the areas of education, civil rights and security. Holding these in mind, we can then reflect on both our current partnerships, and the main directions that emerged from the Initiative’s preparatory consultations and discussions.

To round this process our more fully, we will also add in outside knowledge gathered from resource people and the literature. To bring this learning to the level of practice, we will link it to our approach of working with the environment of the child – families, communities and institutions – to assist in mitigating the effects of disadvantage on indigenous communities. In addition, we will be supporting work on inter-generational relationships in indigenous communities; facilitating the empowerment of communities so they can make appropriate choices for the development of their children; tracking indicators such as children’s access to citizenship, education and language; and achieving programme sustainability in terms of financing, ownership, conceptual skills, and local capacity.

The second main strategy is rights-related. It addresses issues such as citizenship for indigenous children; discrimination; building on traditional childrearing practices; giving importance to language, culture, songs and dance; and so on. To make progress on these, the strategy refers to the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC); and examples of specific work will be drawn from indigenous ECD programmes that the Foundation currently supports. For example, projects that we fund know how to gain citizenship for indigenous children, fight discrimination, and educate Indigenous Peoples – including children – about their rights and how they can be protected. Here the CRC is an extremely important instrument in enabling Indigenous Peoples to lobby government and other actors on the basis of shared ground (respect for the rights of children).

The projects that we support in the area of education also have a lot of experience and accumulated knowledge in indigenous preschools, curriculum development, the ‘indigenising’ of education, and the strengthening of transition to primary school. In terms of raising children aged 0-3 years, a number of studies have already taken place or are in the pipeline to identify and validate existing indigenous practices. In addition, there are well-established efforts to give greater value to the role of elders in taking care of very young children, and to the experience that they embody; while the roles of older siblings are also under scrutiny.

Turning to the promotion of indigenous identity, this is something that runs across virtually all programmes: in the educational process; in the interaction with 0-3 year olds; and in the expression of rights and responsibilities. Here a central strategy is to invest in opportunities for capacity-building so that Indigenous Peoples represent their own interests with all the skills necessary. The Foundation cannot decide what the future of these groups will be, but it can make skills, experience and knowledge available that strengthen Indigenous Peoples in charting their course. Specific attention to indigenous knowledge, history, customary rights, beliefs, and languages are central to keeping indigenous identity intact. Efforts are also underway to counter the negative stereotypes of Indigenous Peoples and to inculcate a sense of pride in indigenous children.

The Growing up in Indigenous Societies Initiative is now operational and engaged in its first full year of activities. These include the first in a series of annual meetings with our indigenous project partners; a review of our support for indigenous ECD projects; and the preparation of a submission to the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child in Geneva in September 2003 to assert the central importance of the early years in ensuring indigenous children’s rights. Future Foundation Annual Reports will include updates about its progress and its findings; and an edition of Early Childhood Matters will be produced.

* The Hundested Recommendations for Donor Best Practice:
1. Have a written policy.
2. Enforce safeguards – do no harm.
3. Have direct contact and relationships with Indigenous Peoples.
4. Base relationships on respect, mutual learning, and reciprocal accountability.
5. Empower and effectively engage indigenous social and political structures.
6. Stay the course. Long-term relationships are key to success.
7. Be transparent.
8. Support Indigenous Peoples in efforts to address core social issues that affect all citizens.
9. Raise the priority of indigenous rights and environmental concerns among other competing priorities during all bilateral and multilateral negotiations.
10. Value donor coordination and work together on these issues.
Young Children and HIV/AIDS

The scale and impact of the HIV/AIDS pandemic over the last 20 years have dramatically increased young children’s vulnerability. Threats to their physical, emotional and cognitive well-being are increased through orphanhood and the loss of the most economically productive family members of the societies in which they live.

At the same time, international recognition of the urgent need to tackle both the causes and impacts of HIV/AIDS has grown and this has been matched by substantial increases in the amount of support that is being promised, for example by the USA. Much of this is targeted for preventing the spread of HIV/AIDS; providing care and support for those infected and affected by the disease; reducing the vulnerability of individuals and communities to HIV/AIDS; and alleviating the socio-economic and human impact of the pandemic.

However, there is still a strong need for the Foundation and others to continue to demonstrate to the broader development community the particular effects that HIV/AIDS has on young children. Just one example, the loss of caregivers in their lives can lead to disadvantage in multiple ways:

- malnutrition during the first few years of life may cause irreversible stunting and damaged cognitive functioning;
- young children deprived of consistent caregivers and simple interpersonal and environmental stimulation also suffer from psychosocially negative consequences; and
- children without quality care in the early years are more likely in the future to drop out of school which in turn, may perpetuate the cycle of poverty as adults.

Orphans under five in particular, face specific challenges. The most obvious of these are:

- that they may be the least welcome in family-based alternative care such as fostering, because they contribute little to household economies and yet require intensive support;
- that they may lose their material assets, following the deaths of their parents;
- that many of them are now in the care of overtaxed elderly grandparents, or of older siblings in child-headed households who have little knowledge of the nutritional and medical needs of young children and who therefore need particular kinds of support;
- that the stigma that they may be subjected to is especially damaging in the early years; and
- that, whatever their circumstances, they are more vulnerable to childhood illnesses and water-borne diseases and are less likely to receive any treatment that requires extra travel, time, and medical fees.

The Young Children and HIV/AIDS Initiative

During 2002, the Foundation therefore completed much of the development of a draft multi-year Young Children and HIV/AIDS Initiative, a focused commitment to work on preventing and alleviating the particular impact of HIV/AIDS on young children, their families and communities. The Initiative builds on almost ten years of investment by the Foundation in young children and HIV/AIDS projects, as well as on the outcomes of a consultation with 32 organisations from 11 countries in Africa, Asia, Europe, and the USA. The outcomes of this consultation were embedded in the Durban Protocol, a set of guiding principles and lines of action that focused on preventing and alleviating the impact of HIV/AIDS on young children and their families.

The Initiative will serve as a bridge between the early childhood development (ECD) and HIV/AIDS communities, by identifying how ECD programmes are responding to the pandemic, and bringing ECD concerns and experience to the attention of organisations fighting HIV/AIDS. And it will put ECD on the radar screen of the HIV/AIDS community, placing young children’s issues in a framework familiar to specialised HIV/AIDS organisations. However, its core work will be devising and implementing appropriate short and long term responses to the particular needs of young children, aligning itself with the efforts of others who are working at micro or macro levels. Its specific objectives are:

1. to improve young children’s developmental outcomes in areas impacted by HIV/AIDS;
2. to develop, document and share models of best practices and effective programmatic choices for partners working with young children and HIV/AIDS;
3. to develop effective advocacy and communication strategies about young children and HIV/AIDS; and
4. to develop the Foundation’s expertise in the young children and HIV/AIDS field.

Two timeframes for action

Looking at the HIV/AIDS crisis from an ECD perspective, it is important to work in two timeframes. The first is that of today, the present day quality of life of young children. Here our greatest concern is the high rates of orphanhood and increased vulnerability. That means an emphasis on care in the Initiative while still holding on to the principle that holistic development of young children is our core interest. In focusing on care, our strategy worldwide is based on the existence of attentive parents and behind them a supportive community, but both of these circles of support are attacked by HIV/AIDS. Most partner organisations in Africa have had to radically alter their programming to deal with this, while in Thailand, the situation is compounded by widespread drug use, which also eats away at responsive parenting.

The Foundation is working from a position of relative strength in the area of care, drawing on its wide experience in ecd, experience that ranges from parent and family support, home-based childcare, to children’s rights, through alternative childcare approaches. Many of these experiences can be adapted to respond to the new situations. Focusing on care will also involve us in areas that are less familiar, including psychosocial support to grieving children, and helping to reconceptualise overwhelmed social welfare delivery systems.

It is also clear that there will soon be more areas where currently viable care structures will not survive for much longer as more families and communities are increasingly weakened by aids and its consequences. To confront this coming reality, the Initiative will be learning from experiences where this has already occurred and will be working closely with the Foundation’s project partners to find replacement structures that meet, as closely as possible, the need of young children to belong to what they feel is their family as a caring environment.

The second time frame is a generational one. The Foundation has always supported early childhood with the idea that investments at this age have important long-term rewards, and we believe this to be equally true in the area of hiv/aids. Many organisations fighting hiv/ aids are so concentrated on helping children survive today’s challenges that they do not always have time to look at the very troubling longer term implications of tens of millions of children growing up without parents. But in this Initiative we are concerned not only with what can be done to improve the day to day quality of life for children, but also with what can be done to give hiv/aids-affected children a chance to grow up into healthy and mature adults. This implies helping caregivers (who range from non-literate grandparents to teenage – or younger – siblings) to acquire parenting and mentoring skills.

Treatment and prevention within an ecd framework

It is in the areas of lasting and effective care, and of ensuring that all children have the best chances possible of benefiting from opportunities to enhance their holistic development, that ecd finds its most natural and significant roles in confronting hiv/aids. However, access to affordable, sustainable treatment is also a key concern to the early childhood community: treatment can extend the lives of family members (one of the best things we can do for children is to help their parents live longer); it can dramatically reduce the chances of mother-to-child transmission; it can delay the onset of aids in hiv-infected children; and it can increase the quality of life and the life expectancy of children living with aids. For the present, we are considering the most appropriate response, whether that is to refer partners to organisations that focus on treatment, prioritise prevention of Mother-to-Child Transmission, or educate ourselves about access to treatment.

Prevention of hiv infection is also a key issue: hiv is not going to go away on its own; and current research is a long way away from producing a cure. Here, much useful work has already been done, particularly in the area of awareness raising: from working with youth and adult groups; through primary and secondary school curricula; to social marketing. But experience has shown that awareness alone frequently does not lead to behaviour change. This is true in part because many of the attitudes and behaviours which promote the spread of hiv/aids are learned much earlier on, and are difficult to change at an adult or perhaps even an adolescent stage. It is our working hypothesis that some of the key adolescent/adult attitudes and behaviours are learned in early childhood – not so much sexual attitudes as questions of self-esteem, respect for others, self-perception vis a vis gender, and critical thinking – and that well-conceived early childhood programming that encourages the development of these characteristics and abilities, can help children grow into adolescents and adults who have a stronger chance of protecting themselves from hiv/aids. We will therefore be pursuing this long term strategy through early childhood development programmes.

More immediately, prevention must take into account vulnerability to, for example, transmission due to abuse, rape, and violence. This protection/harm reduction approach fits naturally within holistic programmes such as parent support programmes that also include a child rights component.

Implementation

The Young Children and hiv/aids Initiative set an agenda in the early part of 2003 that involves learning and sharing on a number of levels: from collecting the experiences of young children via a participative video project, to a major partner consultation in Kenya; from the further strengthening of alliances with institutions and organisations in parallel or complementary fields, to reflecting on the first results of regional programming around hiv/ aids in Southern and East Africa. The Initiative includes a significant documentation and communications component for disseminating experiences, ideas and lessons learned via our website and those of our partners, and via a wide publications programme that includes publishing locally by our project partners.

Financial Report 2002

The Foundation’s income

The regular income of the Foundation in 2002 amounted to EUR 21.048 million, over 90 percent of which came from the Van Leer Group Foundation. The following co-funders also channelled a total of slightly over EUR 300,000 through the Foundation to support work with young children: the Liberty Foundation; the Franciscus O Fund (Belgium) managed by the King Baudouin Foundation; the Third Millennium Foundation; Fund 1818; and two anonymous donors.

Earmarkings for support to projects that benefit young children

In 2002 the Foundation made project earmarkings (money set aside by the Foundation when projects are approved for funding) for a total of EUR 14.801 million in 36 countries. This reflects a continuing increase over the years: the comparable figure for 2001 was EUR 13.811 million. In addition to earmarkings for projects managed by our project partners, up until 2001 earmarkings were also made for Foundation-managed ‘Operational projects’. These were implemented by the Foundation itself and include: Publications and Media; the Effectiveness Initiative; and Tracer Studies. Starting in 2002, such Foundation-managed projects are shown as ‘Programme support projects’ and these appear in Table 4: Expenditure.

An overview of earmarkings by country for the period 2000 – 2002 is set out in Table 1.

Amounts in EUR x 1,000,000

*Through 2001, projects managed within the Foundation were earmarked as ‘Operational Projects’ and were included in the ‘Earmarkings by country’ Table. Starting in 2002, these were renamed as ‘Programme support projects’. They are shown as a separate item under Expenditure (see Table 4).
Monies earmarked for developing and industrialised countries

In 2002, the actual distribution of earmarkings over developing and industrialised countries was in line with the policy of the Foundation: approximately two thirds of monies granted were to developing countries, and one third to industrialised countries. For the categorisation of countries as ‘developing’ or ‘industrialised’, the Foundation uses the United Nations’ criteria.

Earmarkings by amount

Earmarkings for substantial amounts relate to long term projects. The development of these projects is carefully monitored and actively supported; and the processes and outcomes of such projects are analysed with a view to informing policy and practice. They provide the Foundation with the profile it wishes to have: not just a funder but an organisation that adds value to its funding and that learns from its own experiences. Table 3 provides a breakdown of the amounts earmarked in 2002.

Overview of expenditure

Starting from 2002, the Foundation is presenting its expenses in three categories: earmarkings to projects (i.e. external grantees); Programme support projects (formerly Operational Projects – see page 30); and Central costs (the operations of the Department of Programme Development and Management, and the Department of Programme Documentation and Communication; and Management and Administrative costs).

An overview of the Foundation’s grantmaking in 2002

The major part of the Foundation’s income is spent on supporting projects for young children living in disadvantaged circumstances. These projects are operated by local project partners, ensuring that they are context specific, and show a rich diversity of approaches. Overall, our funding is guided by geographical and programmatic priorities, but we also focus on a number of themes that are currently of interest in our programming. Projects are implemented by local project partners who may be public, private or community-based organisations; and special attention is given to children growing up in diverse and multicultural societies; indigenous children; migrant; refugee or internally displaced children; children of single or teenage parents; children in conflict or disaster-stricken areas; and children affected by HIV/AIDS.

The projects that we support seek to improve the quality of care and education for young children by, for instance by focusing on the home environment and the community; seeking to enhance parenting skills; upgrading the quality of early childhood development programming; and engaging in public education and advocacy on behalf of vulnerable children.

In this overview, the grants that we made to support projects during 2002 are presented regionally to show how our programming often reflects the fact that important early childhood themes – such as Respect for Diversity; HIV/AIDS and Parent and Family Support – are seldom contained by national boundaries. Each entry generally includes the following information: name of project; name of partner organisation(s);... objective(s). Fuller details about all projects that the Foundation currently funds can be found in our publication This is available for reading or downloading on our website (www.bernardvanleer.org).

The Effectiveness Initiative

The Effectiveness Initiative is a five year, in-depth, qualitative look at what makes ecd programmes work for the people who take part in them, and for the communities that are intended to be enriched by them. It involves 10 diverse projects operating in a range of diverse settings. Many of these are featured below as they move through the cross-site analyses and the dissemination stages of their work within the Effectiveness Initiative; while other projects are for specific pieces of work associated with aspects of the ecd. More information about the Effectiveness Initiative is available on the Foundation’s website: www.bernardvanleer.org

Cross-site analyses

Project title: Children in Emergencies
Partner organisation(s): Center For Documentary Studies, Duke University, USA
Grant: EUR 11,000

Overall objective(s): To draw on eci findings to produce a series of articles on ‘Young Children in Emergencies’ and to develop a peer review journal article for a non-ecd audience.

Project title: On Practicing Inclusion
Partner organisation(s): Center For Documentary Studies, Duke University, USA
Grant: EUR 12,000

Overall objective(s): To prepare a documentary ‘On Practicing Inclusion’ using photography, oral history and written observation to illustrate how children at risk have been fully integrated into field programmes.

Project title: Reinventing Cultures

Project title: CoF International Programme
Partner organisation(s): Community of Foundations (CoF)
Location of project: Mozambique
Grant: EUR 250,000

Overall objective(s): To produce a video in order to: draw on eci findings to produce a paper that will focus on issues related to families and communities which are displaced for various reasons.

Tracer Studies

Tracer studies aim to look at the impact of early childhood programmes. The Foundation has supported nine such studies since 1997, all of which have followed up children or adults who participated in early childhood programmes some years earlier. Each study is designed and implemented locally, either by the project partner or with its full cooperation. The samples are relatively small and the methodology is qualitative more than quantitative. One tracer study was funded in 2002. More information about the Tracer Studies is available on the Foundation’s website: www.bernardvanleer.org

Project title: Tracer Study of the pomic Programme
Partner organisation(s): Christian Children’s Fund (ccf)
Location of project: Honduras
Grant: EUR 33,000

Overall objective(s): To undertake a tracer study on the impact on, and changes in, the knowledge and attitudes of mothers and children who participated in the Maternal-Child Orientation Program (pomic) that provides adequate early stimulation for children from 0-6 years and is expected to enhance performance in school, particularly during the first year.
About the Bernard van Leer Foundation

The Bernard van Leer Foundation is a private foundation, established in 1949, and based in The Netherlands. It operates internationally. Its income is derived from the bequest of Bernard van Leer, a Dutch industrialist and philanthropist, who lived from 1883 to 1958. Bernard van Leer was the founder of Royal Packaging Industries Van Leer.

The Foundation aims to enhance opportunities for children aged zero to eight years growing up in circumstances of social and economic disadvantage, with the objective of developing their potential to the greatest extent possible. We concentrate on children zero to eight years because research findings have demonstrated that interventions in the early years of childhood are most effective in yielding lasting benefits to children and society.

The Foundation fulfils its objective through two interdependent strategies:

- making grants to, and supporting programmes for, culturally and contextually appropriate approaches to early childhood development;
- sharing knowledge and expertise in early childhood development, with the aim of informing and influencing policy and practice.

Programme development and grantmaking

We currently support around 150 major projects in almost 40 developing and industrialised countries worldwide. These projects operate in a variety of contexts, with a rich diversity of approaches. Our funding is guided by geographical and programmatic priorities, but we also focus on specific themes. Projects are implemented by local partners who may be public, private or community-based organisations.

Among the groups of vulnerable children we try to reach, special attention is given to:

- children growing up in diverse and multicultural societies;
- indigenous children;
- migrant, refugees or internally displaced children;
- children of single or teenage parents;
- children in conflict or disaster-stricken areas;
- children affected by HIV/AIDS.

The projects we support seek to improve the quality of care and education for young children, by, for instance:

- focusing on the home environment and the community;
- seeking to enhance parenting skills;
- upgrading the quality of early childhood development programming;
- engaging in public education and advocacy on behalf of vulnerable children.

Documenting, learning and sharing

Another aim of the Foundation is to analyse and to disseminate, through a print and web publishing programme, the rich variety of knowledge, know-how and lessons learned that emerge from the projects that we support and from other key sources. Our audiences include practitioners, trainers, academics and policy makers. A list of our publications is available on request, or on our website: www.bernardvanleer.org.

Lasting benefits

All of our work is predicated on the belief that investing in young children, and strengthening the circles of support around them, yields many lasting benefits:

- Children benefit through enhanced survival chances, better health, improved social skills and school performance in later years, higher self-esteem and a positive outlook.
- Parents and caregivers are able to strengthen their capacity to support their children, and can enrich their own self-confidence and motivation.
- For communities, the gains include greater self-reliance and motivation to take on new tasks, and an improvement in the social fabric of the community itself. This can provide a springboard for wider social change and community development.

The Foundation therefore:

- takes a holistic approach. We are concerned with young children’s overall development – their physical, social, intellectual, cultural and emotional development.
- Which leads us to promote multi-dimensional programming approaches. These are developed within a conceptual framework that integrates health, nutrition, care, learning, and social actions.
- Believes that children’s development is primarily the responsibility of parents.
- Which leads us to promote initiatives that seek to increase parents’ capacity to support their children’s development.
- Believes in the importance of the involvement of the community as a major factor in children’s development.
- Which leads us to encourage participatory approaches at the community level and initiatives that help to empower groups or individuals to participate.
- Believes in the importance of context.
- Which leads us to promote development strategies that are culturally, socially and economically appropriate.
- Believes in the importance of creating an enabling environment.
- Which leads us to promote activities that create an understanding of the rights and needs of young children, their families and communities, among NGOs, governments, international organisations, and the donor community.
To maximise its effectiveness in its support for work that furthers the holistic development of young children, the Bernard van Leer Foundation avoids spreading its resources too thinly. It does this by organising its grantmaking in two ways: 1) through developing Country Programmes in a limited range of countries; and 2) through developing Thematic Programmes around a limited number of important themes.

Country Programmes
A Country Programme is a set of projects that respond to local contexts and realities, and that are operated by local partner organisations. For each country, the Foundation develops a country-specific strategy that guides the selection of projects. Every five years, the Foundation’s Board of Trustees determines in which countries such programmes may be developed. The following table sets out eligible countries for the period 2002-2006. Countries no longer eligible are shown separately.

Thematic Programmes
Thematic Programmes explore one specific topic – for example, Young Children Affected by HIV/AIDS; Respect for Diversity; or Growing up in Indigenous Societies. Themes do not relate to national contexts but to key areas of interest across borders. This means that Thematic Programmes may occasionally include countries that are not otherwise eligible for funding. Within these programmes, the Foundation invests in activities that will inform its understandings and highlight key programmatic experiences.
